Glossary

Bid and ask price spread and margins	The bid and ask price refers to the price at which a security can be bought or sold. The bid price is the highest price that a buyer is prepared to pay for a security. The ask price is the lowest price at which a seller is prepared to sell a security. The difference between the bid and ask price is known as the spread. This spread is essentially the difference between the highest price someone is willing to pay and the lowest price someone is willing to accept. The spread can serve as an indicator of the market liquidity—the smaller the spread, the more liquid the market. In this context, the margin refers to the profit that a broker or trader earns from the spread between the bid and ask price.
Collective tax statements without application for reimbursement	Compilation of the recoverable withholding tax amounts without the corresponding applications for reimbursement.
Commission business	One example of a commission transaction is the purchase or sale of securities. The client gives the bank or broker an order to buy or sell a certain number of shares at a certain price. The bank or broker executes the order and receives a commission for it. Commission business can also include other types of financial transactions, such as the purchase or sale of foreign currencies, derivatives or other financial instruments.
Increased regulatory effort	One-off/periodic clarification work and/or ongoing monitoring measures for business relationships that require close supervision by the bank, particularly for legal/regulatory reasons. This concerns, for example, business relationships in connection with measures to combat money laundering, business relationships with politically exposed persons (as defined in the Anti-Money Laundering Act), business relationships in connection with official investigations, business relationships in connection with international sanctions or business relationships related to sensitive jurisdictions.
Invested assets	All the assets in an investment solution (e.g., securities, physical positions held in a custody account, money market investments and account balances). The absolute value of individual holdings is added together, and they cannot be offset against each other, for example, with short positions, forward contracts.
Investment strategy	The guideline and approach defined by the investor concerning how the portfolio should be managed. These may relate to specific investment instruments, currencies, industries and time periods.
Non-traditional investment products	Investments that cannot be allocated to traditional asset classes such as equities, bonds or money market products. They comprise a wide variety of instruments and strategies (e.g., hedge funds or third-party private equity).
Operating companies	Companies that carry out a trade, production or service operation, or operate another business of a commercial nature.

Safe custody	Safe custody refers to the management of securities by a bank or other financial service provider. This includes the safekeeping of securities, clearing for purchases and sales, the booking of dividends or interest and the execution of corporate actions such as share splits or capital increases.
Secondary market	A secondary market is the market where securities that have already been issued—such as shares, bonds, options and futures—are traded. New securities, by contrast, are sold to investors for the first time by the issuing companies on the primary market. On the secondary market, investors can trade securities among themselves without the issuing company being directly involved. This allows investors to liquidate their investments by selling their securities to other investors. Most stock exchanges, such as the New York Stock Exchange or the Frankfurt Stock Exchange, are examples of secondary markets. The price of securities on the secondary market is determined by supply and demand.
Securities transactions	Securities transactions refer to the purchase, sale or transfer of securities such as shares, bonds, fund units or derivatives. These transactions are usually carried out via a stock exchange or another financial market. They can also take place off-exchange, meaning directly between two parties without the involvement of an exchange.
Stamp duty	Stamp duty is a tax that is levied in some countries on certain types of legal transactions. It is normally calculated as a percentage of the transaction value and is due when the transaction is concluded. The stamp duty is usually a non-recurring fee that is payable upon completion of the transaction, unlike ongoing taxes such as income tax or VAT.
Stock exchange fee	A fee charged by a stock exchange for the securities transaction processing it provides. In Switzerland, for example, the SIX Swiss Exchange charges a fee for all exchange and off-exchange transactions.
Third-party transaction charges	Third-party transaction charges are fees charged by a bank that is not your own. These may be incurred, for example, if you withdraw money from an ATM that does not belong to your bank or if you make a transfer to another country. The amount of these fees may vary depending on the bank and the type of transaction.
Total assets	Includes all assets (e.g., securities positions, physical positions held in a custody account, money market investments and account balances). The absolute value of individual holdings is added together, and they cannot be offset against each other, for example, with short positions or forward contracts. Fees calculated on the basis of total assets are debited to the individual investment solutions proportionally.
Trading value	The trading value, also called market value or stock market value, is the price at which an asset (such as a share, bond or other security) is traded on an open market. It is determined by supply and demand and can change over time.
